Classical political economy in Russia

The influence exerted by Ziber's interpretation of Ricardo might be a factor explaining the persistence of classical political economy in Russia, and the distinctive character of this intellectual tradition with respect to the 'modernised' form of classicism then prevailing in Britain under the influence of Mill and Marshall.

(Scazzieri 1987, 23)

Classical political economy has a long tradition in Russia, starting in the early nineteenth century. Within classical political economy, Russian economists were not primarily interested in value theory. They were instead entangled in more applied and urgent issues such as the consequences of enforced labour on economic development, the search for an optimal tariff policy, or the need for regulation of rural credit. And it is only from the 1870s onwards that the theory of value started to attract their attention. This can be explained in part by the gradual transformation of the methodology used by Russian economists towards more theoretical concerns during the first half of the nineteenth century.<sup>1</sup> But one can also see here the influence of the various reforms of the 1860s. The abolition of serfdom implied that labour acquired a value. As a consequence, the concept of wage, which was a theoretical notion borrowed from Western manuals of political economy, became an empirical notion. The same applied to land, which could (and most of the time should) be purchased by peasants from their former landlords. The ongoing redistribution of land implied purchase, sale and rent. As a consequence, the concepts of land as capital and rent appeared as well. Eventually, the nascent industry introduced capital, wages and profits as empirical realities.
