1.0 Introduction

This chapter has two objectives. First, to familiarize the reader with my view of strategic work and how it goes well beyond rational decision-making and goal-oriented planning. Second, to present my general argument. I have tried to keep my language in the realm of everyday talk and commonsense and avoid packing the text with academic terminology and citations. There are footnotes, but I have tried to make the text understandable without requiring the reader to have studied other material, to be followable on the basis of their everyday experience of the business world. I have also tried to make the text gender-neutral—especially difficult in English—and avoid too narrow an emphasis on US management thinking. The explosive growth of business schools and management education worldwide has reinforced English as the lingua franca of business, so Anglo-American thinking too often dominates. We all hope to see important business literature in Spanish, French, Japanese, Chinese, and Russian soon—but that is for later. The reader will also see some circularity and repetition. This is not simply about style. It reflects my coming at strategy with assumptions that differ from those most strategy writers adopt, more “subjective” and less “objective,” and my sense that I need to say some basic things more than once.
